

Rachel Morris
Communications Specialist

Rachel Morris is the Communications Specialist for Georgia Prevention Project. Her role includes building and maintaining community partnerships, managing the day to day activities of our team members, and overseeing any creative projects related to our social media or community outreach. In addition, she manages our Substance Education Training Program, Internship Program, and our new College Expansion Program. Rachel joined the GPP family in January 2021.

Rachel originally found her way to GPP as a college undergraduate looking for a local organization to complete her capstone project through. GPP was kind enough to take her on as an intern, and it was history ever sense. During her internship, Rachel gained valuable experience in event planning and management, program design, and in communications. She had the opportunity of designing our first ever virtual Vape Summit, which allowed middle and high school students from across the state to learn about the dangers of vaping amidst COVID-19. That following year Rachel was brought on as our Substance Education Training (SET) Program Coordinator, where she single handedly re-vamped all of our educational resources that are currently offered for both middle and high school educators. Additionally, she established our Annual SET training and has trained over 100 educators in the state of Georgia on the impact of substance use. Thanks to her, our resources are now in 95 counties across the state. GPP has given Rachel a deep appreciation for the non-profit field and she looks forward to growing both professionally and personally in the coming years.

Rachel was born and raised in Duluth Georgia and graduated from Kennesaw State University with her Bachelors in Public Health Education. She is currently working on achieving her CP Certification (Certified Preventionist) to ensure that she is utilizing best practices within the substance use prevention field. Rachel is a multi-passionate person and enjoys hiking, painting, yoga, and cooking in her spare time.
